

or that you guys know, let me know. I was thinking I could just start off by just give you the general strategy, how YouTubers tend to, like, grow. Yeah. So... You mind if I just record this? Yeah, go for it. Cool. Again, it might be obvious and self-explanatory. Let me know if it's on, but like at a high level. The way that I worked on a bunch of YouTube channels, whether it's Alex Harmosi, Mr. Beast, Shamoth's recent one, just and it's surprising that they all have the same strategy. The way that you grow on YouTube is you find outliers. So it's called the Outliers, right? You never mind have told you a little bit about this. So, um, a lot of people, uh, decide to just post random videos and just see what works, but what's better to do is to find what worked for somebody else and then do that. The way you find outliers, I guess I'll explain what the outlier metric is, if you go to a YouTube channel and you look at their average views and you see a video that has more views in their average views, that's an outlier. So you can imagine there's a channel that has a thousand average views, and one of their videos has 10,000 views. What that means is that the people that watched that video weren't from the channel. That means that the algorithm pushed it in general. So what you want to do is you want to collect videos that the algorithm is pushing. ideas and then reconvene them and make them your own. So, for example, if you could see a video on YouTube that has a million views, and you see one that has 10,000 views, the general instinct is you want to do what the million, the 1000000 view video is. But if you go to that million viewed channel and their average view count is 10 million, like, it doesn't make sense, that's a .one outlier. It means that it actually wasn't pushed. versus if you go to the video that has 10,000 views and go to their channel and their average view count is 100, that's a 100 X outlier. That means the algorithm pushed it. And what the algorithm wants to do is it wants to find markets and it wants to find an audience that, uh, to serve a video. All to say, the general thing that Shamoth channel does, which is the channel that I run right now, he does on the all-in podcast, or Mr. Beast does, is they find outlier from smaller channels, and they literally just make the better version of it. So I'll give you an example. So for the Shamaf YouTube channel. I wanted to start off with a bang. So I went on a tool called oneoften.com, and I found a video that had a 200 view multiplier called, it was something like, um, it took me 50 years to learn this. And then the thumbnail title was, I wasted my whole life. Um, so I pitched them off a video like that, like, just, it ended up being called. It took me 30 years to learn this about business. And then the thumbnail title was something that he said in the video. I'll just say that video got 700,000 views for his 1st video on a new channel. 700,000 views. The next video, Shamoff wanted to do one of his own ideas, not outlier, like, filter, just something that he wanted to do. That video has 70,000 views. So I told them, hey, let's do another outlier video. I found another outlier video. It was something along the lines of once I understood this about knitting, my life changed. So I pitched Shamov. Once I understood this about investing, my life changed. That video did 500,000 views. The next video, Shamaf wanted to do a video that just, like, was his own idea again. It got 80,000 dues. The video after that, I found another outlier, something like, um, this is what I learned from being around the top one%. That's what I found as an outlier. So I pitched Shamov. This is what I learned from here on the top, 0.01%. That video is gonna do 300,000 views right now. Just a very simple case study over the past 6 weeks that the outlier videos, like outperforming video videos 5 X. So what that means then now is, in order to grow a channel, is you have to learn how to find these outlier videos, and there's tools for that. That's generally what a YouTube strategist does. So for the past 7 years I've been a YouTube strategist. But generally what they're paid to do is to find the outlier videos and figure out how to work it in your niche or your channel. And then just literally hammer out as many of those outlier videos as possible. Like, that's generally what you want to do. That's how the channels that grow grow so fast. Right. So 2 questions. So, one, does the publishing date matter? Are you looking for videos in the past week, because the algorithm changes over time. That's a good question. I generally look for the past three months. Okay. Yeah. Yeah, also old videos can become an outlier. Right. Like later on, like videos that were posted too. They start to get pushed all of a sudden for everything. Yeah, yeah, yeah. And then you know, like right now, the algorithm is pushing that idea. And the reason is because the algorithm found a market for it. And it's like, there's a market, if people get served this video, they will watch it. So... Yeah, yeah. So all to say, the number one game is to find, in social media, growth in general, whether it's Instagram, YouTube, any platform, is to find outliers and mimic them. You don't want to copy them exactly, because otherwise, like, it has to be way better for the algorithms suddenly push it, but you want to, like, what I would do for the channels is I would find two outliers that were similar, and I would combine them. So, like, for example, there was a video I pitched to reendorse. He a neuroscientist. I found an outlier in a car mechanic space. Is that something like, how to fix your whole car in a day, and the thumbnail text was something like, it only takes, um, 3 hours. Right. And then I found a productivity video that did well. And so I pitched the neuroscientist how to finish one month of work today. And then the thumbnail text was, It only takes 11 hours. You can see the similarities. That video got 1.2 million views in a month. So, all to say, like, you don't want to copy it exactly, but you want to find what worked. And that, and then do that. Can I ask? Yeah. What we did the other day. The all our videos we did, those are, like, perfect, but I think we need to code them in to the space of our niche of recovery and sobriety so that we can start using that, because the algorithm looks at, like, words and thumbnails, and if we can like really dial into that niche, it'll start serving each video, it'll it'll get closer and closer to the target audience, that's going to like grow the channel. I definitely think that you can take an outlier from another niche and apply it to your niche. So, for example, the Shamov one that I fished about investing. Like, the original one was about, like, time management or about, like, some sort of hobby. I forgot what it was, but it wasn't about investing. But the point was, we took the, once I understood this about X, my life changed, and you could replace it. So the goal is definitely... It's definitely to cross pollinate. But just, like, that's literally the general way you grow strategically. You find outliers in a platform, and you do what you can to take that pattern and apply it to your channel. Now, if you don't mind, I just want to give 2 things. Were this applies on YouTube is thumbnail title, and I'll dive deeper on that right now, where it applies to shorts is the 1st 2 sentences of the short. So on YouTube. For spoken 2 sentences? Oh, yeah, description. Yeah, the 1st book, just like... So, on YouTube, people don't watch unless they click. So it's obvious to say, but the most important thing on YouTube is the thumbnail title. When I was with Mr. Beast, Mr. Beast would pay 25 to 75 grand on thumbnail title research before he didn't shoot the video. Wow. So it's almost like the equivalent of people make the billboard first, then they make the movie. Like, Diary of a CEO, um, that the biggest podcast in the world, they have, they run ad campaigns on Facebook, where they just like literally push like 50 filming on titles per episode before they, before sometimes they even ask the guests the questions. They see which thumbnail and title got the most clicks, then they make sure the 1st question they ask the guest is from that thumbnail title that won. You can show us something. That sounds. Yeah. Yeah, so I was gonna ask you, like, how do we apply this outlier formula to a podcast? Is, like, scripting... How much time? I might have a few meetings for the movie stuff, but I'll try to send it for as much of it. Or I could just take my work here or something. But we'll figure that out. Yeah, I'm gonna get to that. So, for YouTube, you want to optimize a thumbnail title. For shorts, it's the first two sentences. The, and by the way, I, like, I obviously have a lot of knowledge on this. if I'm going too nitty-gritty, like let me know. I can respond. That's great. So, with the thumbnail and title, there's a few things that are very important, because you can get the thumbnail and title right by finding an outlier, but what you have to do next is you have to validate the click. So oftentimes people have the thumbnail and title, right? But if in the first 15 to 30 seconds of the video, you don't say the words in the thumbnail and title, like people are out. Like, it's actually comical. Like, when you, like, when you, like, really see this pattern. Like, if you go on your YouTube homepage and you click videos that have 1000000s of views that are recent, like, almost the 1st two sentences are gonna be the tummy on title. Like, Mr. Beast will say, the Thumblatown will be, like, last to, like, push the butt and wins, and this 1st sentence will literally be that. If you think about it as, like, mass hypnosis, you could almost imagine, like, if a thumbnail entitle is a portal, like, you don't want there to be a block from the portal to the video. So, like, so almost getting the exact idea, right, from the thumbnail and title, and the first sense of the script. It almost makes it a seamless transition to the content. On YouTube, also, it's not just thumb the own title that gets people a click, because on YouTube now, people hover over the image, and they can see the first few seconds of the video. So, obviously, like, what they say in the first seconds of the video is gonna matter whether they're gonna click or not. So that being said, those words should match. Um, so that's... I feel annoyed if I click on a video, and it's not at all about the thing that I... Yeah, immediately click off, and it's like, this is not the thing. And then what happens is, like, and then from there, the algorithm goes. The average iteration is now one second, and doesn't serve it. Versus, if you plan the family own title up front, before you do the video, you can actually, like, make sure that the first census or the family own title. Because that requires plan it. Otherwise, otherwise, if you do the thumb title after you do the hook, the thumb title has to now match the hook. And then now you don't start with thinking the outlier in mind. Now it's, like, the hook in mine. So anyways, thumbs out first. The way you are discovered through a short form video, which, by the way, short form video is the fastest way to go viral and grow something, it's short form video, like it's even across from long form, I've done videos on long form where, like, in a month, we get a 1000000 views on a new channel. But, like, the short form, you can get like 10000000 views. Like, it's kind of crazy. All of the celebrities, like Alex Harmosi, Gary Bainer, Chuck, um, even like clavicular, like, um, I know people on their teams. And, like, what they have is, and this is not practical, I think, because they have 1000000s of dollars to fund it, but they have clip farms on Discord, where they have 2000 editors, and they're only paid based on competition. So they give them a whole podcast, literally 2000 editors, and they go, the top 5 viewed editors on this discord will get 5 grand each. And so they're not paying the 2000 editors, but they're all in competition to make a clip that will get a lot of views. They also give them all ad revenue. So, like, so they don't keep that. So the point is, like, Alex Harmosi, Andrew Tate, Covicular, Imangazi. These are like, these are guys up a little better nowhere. they all have that structure. Like they literally had a clip farm, which is kind of wild. It's not practical necessarily, but just to be clear, like, um, that's how they incentivize them. The reason why, reels are the fastest way to grow, at least like go viral, is that, um, it's pure discoverability. Like people swipe up and they're already watching. Like with long form, they have to click. With reels, if they're served it, they either swipe or not swipe, which is why the 1st 2 sentences are very important. The thumbnail on description and title on a reel is not very important because they're not clicking into it. Like they're being served it as they scroll. So the 1st 2 sentences are what the outlier would be. So, for example, if in the YouTube long form, the outlier is, let them entitle a click, and that's what you mimic, for the short form is the 1st 2 sentences. So what you do is it's the exact same thing. You find reels from niches that are similar or similar in your space, you find ones that have a 10x to 100x outlier, you click into them, and you literally copy and paste this 1st sentences, and then do your own body. Right. So this is what would be really nice for us to, like, research these outrage, to have research questions, and then, like, have these research questions verbatim, like, read them off of things, so we have the clip of him being, like, oh, the most challenging part of your recovery was, and then just play their answer immediately. That's what dire CEO does. Yeah, yeah. As a dire CEO. And in general, in general, on YouTube, what people say is there's a term called best practices. It's like, it's an industry's term, it just means like, like, when I was working on reindorse this channel. Like, on our meetings, we'd be like, okay, what are the best practices? And then we go to Diary C, yeah, we go to J Shetty. and we literally just, what are they doing? Because they have a team and that they're paying 1000000s of dollars a year to do the right thing. So, like, so what they're doing is the right thing. Now you can just arbitrage that, not pay the 1000000s of dollars, just do what they're doing. So that's generally how people get their strategies. They just, diary CEO, change their strategy? What do they do? So the thing about the hooks is so powerful as like a case study. One of my friends, he wanted to get famous on Instagram. He just sold a car insurance company and he couldn't figure out the shorts algorithm. He applied the outlier strategy, where he literally just copied the hook, and he was getting 20,000 followers a month now. And like, but the interesting thing about it was, he told me, Johnny, what I wrote for the body doesn't fucking matter. I literally just, like, said the hook. The body didn't matter. It was so weird how funny it is, like, like... like, there's this zeitgeist that people, like, clip onto, and it's, like, I want to know the top 10 ways to whatever. Yeah, it was just so weird to me, 'cause, like, he was, like, I would just, literally verbatim, read the hook, the sound, the outlier, and then I would, like, come up with something for the body. But for some reason, the hook just to hook did most of the work. So all to say, like, that's kind of like, I'll go into podcast specific in how I think we could apply it to your channel now, but overall, that's how I would think about the packaging and coming up with ideas. And the more you can be aligned with that and strategic about that, um, the more, um, chance I think you have at, like, blowing up. Um, in terms of how I think that applies to your channel, I would say is you should have 2 formats. Juniper went a little bit into this. I should talk to you about it in the past, but obviously a podcast, it's harder to engineer a, like, there's ways to do it with a lot of research, but it's just slightly harder to engineer, like, a thumbnail and title, like, before, and I think you guys should still work to it. But what's a lot more controllable is to do just talking to camera videos. And, uh, where you literally have 5 scripts that you wrote specifically to match up. Exactly. I think you should just do a podcast, do a talking ahead video, do a podcast, do a talking ahead video. And over time, talking ahead videos are gonna start to perform really well. Yeah. And those, and in the talking head... Yeah, your podcast, and then do an outlier, specifically into your outlier video. Okay, got it. And that's in place of an episode. No, just another format. In addition, another format. And then and then in those videos that just have a higher chance at getting more views just because they're specifically engineered for views, you mention your podcast 2 times organically. So in each video you go, so I don't know what the outliers that you never found were, but you naturally segue 30 seconds in. By the way, guys, like if you're liking this, we talked to, we talked about this with my guest last week. Go check out the episode. And then so you just do that twice. So then every video that you're pushing, that's gonna probably get more views, is mentioning the podcast. I think of your shorts. You can write these shorts based on the hooks, batch shoot them, release one outlier engineered short a day, and in each short, you mention the podcast organically. And so over time you start to get more views, people will start to go to the podcast. Are you guys thumbnail testing? Like, like,
